

Workshop 2: Interpret The World

As an adult, how do you observe the world?

In what ways do you observe, process and communicate ?

What does observing and interpreting the world look like through the eyes of young children?

As educators how can we support young learners who express themselves in different ways?

In our second educator's workshop we will delve deeper into the core values of the Reggio Emilia approach, focusing on the concept of the 'hundred languages.' In Reggio Emilia the "hundred languages" celebrates the many ways children express themselves and interpret the world, recognizing that each child brings a unique perspective to their learning journey. (Reggio Children). While children work through problems and ideas, they are encouraged to illustrate their understanding using their many different 'hundred languages' to work through experiences and projects.

You will

- foster an environment that honors these diverse expressions.
- support young children in communicating their ideas, emotions, and understanding through various mediums.
- Revisit the use of the 'Provocation Tracker'*(Educator Workshop 1) to plan provocations that extend upon children's interests.
- Connect observations of children in play to the 21st century skills.
